interested. But then it turned out that the blockchain (on the DAG) is based on witnesses, like Google and others. Twelve witnesses. No witnesses, no blockchain. I found a video of a lecture by one of the developers\nByteball. He was very unconvincing about the case. The audience was disappointed too, I think. Witnesses have to continuously add their transactions to the DAG 24/7. Thus witnessing the past. If you later add a transaction with a re-spend and parents from the past, there will be no witnesses on the way and it will be invalid. The blockchain is written entirely in js. The database is on mysql.\nTo deploy the full client, you need to rent a server, install everything on it, and get a certificate for SSL. The network exchange is over https.\nAlthough I had the idea of running the client over an anonymously obtained server.

Since I hadn't decided which blockchain principle to stop on, I started to look at it. This blockchain is written in Rust. The language is new. I'm actually a programming languages\nconservative, as I stuck to c++. But I need to figure out the blockchain, so I downloaded a tutorial on Rust, installed the compiler and for the third day I'm learning. Rust is said to be very suitable for blockchain development. Let's see. If it's really true that this language improves programmers' productivity, then why not. NFT also came up. We'll have to see. What I've determined for myself is that blockchain should be done in DAG. The unit of record in the DAG will not be a block with a bunch of transactions, but a single transaction. A transaction can contain any entity: a coin transfer, a contract, a token of some kind (NFT). As a database mysql, probably. Not decided yet, double spend, witnesses. Witnesses can be developers (us), in principle. For now."
